

On Thursday 18th April Trudi Warner, a 68-year old retired social worker, will appear at the Royal Courts of Justice, charged with Contempt of Court.

Her crime? Holding a sign that states a fundamental legal principle:
The right of a jury to decide a case according to its conscience.

The same message is proudly recorded on a plaque in the Old Bailey, which celebrates the “courage and endurance” of the jury that first established this right in 1670.

As the rights of the jury are attacked in our courts by an increasingly authoritarian government, the UN has declared the clampdown in Britain on those who take nonviolent action to defend life as “frightening”.

We must all stand with Trudi Warner, and show that she is not alone in asserting a fundamental principle of justice.
